Surface plasmons have some unique properties including their inherent ultra-high electric field enhancement (up to several hundred times) and nanoscale localization of laser radiation (well below the diffraction limit). In addition, surface plasmon excitations exhibit ultrafast transients. I will review the fundamental properties of surface plasmons and show some ultrafast applications for accelerator photocathodes, attophysics and ultrafast optical transistors.